Like you would before other daunting career situations, give yourself a little pep-talk: You’re thoughtful and interesting, that’s why they’ll remember who you are. Now, if you think they’ll need some context because of the sheer number of people they speak to at events, then provide it, but go on to write what you would to other contacts.

Thank you for this, the inherent accusation of forgetfulness hadn't occurred to me with "not sure if you remember me" before. However, I do think this is more of a British English thing, as it's also self-deprecating, in that it's also saying "I do not consider myself important enough that you would consume energy storing me in your brain.".
