"Getting in front on data quality" stands in contrast to the reactive approach most companies take today. It involves attacking data quality proactively by searching out and eliminating the root causes of errors. To be clear, this is about management, not technology — data quality is a business problem, not an IT problem.

We'll just use the GET method here and set the URL as our url variable. Add this below your previous line: `request.open('GET', url);` Next, we'll set the type of response we are expecting — which is defined by the request's `responseType` property — as `text`. This isn't strictly necessary here — XHR returns text by default — but it is a good idea to get into the habit of setting this in case you want to fetch other types of data in the future.
